"While the primary object of this collection is to obtain authentic material for the preparation of this history, another and scarcely less important end is the permanent preservation of these valuable documents themselves.

shook hands with all. The joke of this part of the ceremony was, that after the old man had welcomed the Governor, and find all his suite presented by his Excellency, he turned round, very innocently, to the oriental interpreter of the government, and asked, 'Which is the Governor?'

"The ceremony of presentation in the courtyard being daished, the Chief Brahmin took the Governor by the hand and led him into the house, all the autic and stendants following. All the Governor's domestics, dressed in searlet and gold haftans, and bearing long and massive allyer sticks with large Knobs to them, entered the courtyard and house with us, although both these places were apparently filled with native friends of the host, who, doubtless, had been invited to witness the lamps of various colors were suspended from this temporary roof.

"Bound the senier of this extemporized room, leaving an open space in the middle of about thirty feet by fifteen, sofas were arranged, one being placed crossways at the top as the place of honor for the Governor, towards which he and the Chief Brahmin advanced and took their seats there side by side.

"The Commander in Chief was on the Governor's left, on a chair, and the corresponding chair on the Chief Brahmin's right was left vacant. I entared the room, of course, among the last; the Governor, however, sent to request me to occupy the vacant seat on the Brahmin's right, and again introduced me to him; no doubt he wondered who the guest was to whom so much honor was done.

"After a few minutes' conversation in

The fruits in the dishes were then handed round in the like manner, and similarly disposed of to the servants, who seized the profiered gifts with avidity. Not one of the guests partook of any of the delicacies (?) offered them.

"Sir Bartle Frere, was talking to me white this farce was going on and explaining to me all about it, he told me that our host was hereditary Chief Brahmin. I then inquired whether the little boy standing behind the sofa was the Brahmin's son. "No," was the Governor's reply; that is the poor old man's grievance; he has no son to succeed him, only a nephew," After the sweetmeats and fruits had all been disposed of in the manner I have stated, the old Brahmin made another tour of the rose water from a large silver vase. These silver trays and vessels were very handsome and curiously chased, but they looked like lead, no attempt having been made either to clean or to polish them.

"At last the Governor rose to take leave, when a simultaneous shout from the assemblage said something which I was assured was very complimentary to the Queen's representative, although, of course, I could not, understand a word. The Chief Brahmin shook hands with each of us again on leaving the outer court yard, and we marched out into the crowded lane bedecked with the flowers that had been heaped upon us, the etiquette forbidding us to divest ourselves of them while in the presence or close to the residence of the host; before reaching our carriages, however, we had disposed of all our trappings, either to the servants in attendance or to the children among the thousands of natives that gazed on us with wonder and admiration."
